

How does Arts and Humanities research influence public policymaking?

Project Scholar:
Luke Sewell
History Undergraduate

Project Supervisor:
Arlene Holmes-Henderson MBE,
Professor of Classics and Ancient History

IN PARTNERSHIP WITH...

The University of Durham

The Universities Policy Engagement Network (UPEN)

The Laidlaw Leadership and Research Programme

USEFUL FOR...

Arts and Humanities academics, policymakers and those interested in how policy is formulated.

OBJECTIVE...

To showcase recent successful examples of Arts and Humanities research influencing public policymaking.

BACKGROUND...

The Arts and Humanities are useful for mapping complex human issues for which there are no definitive solutions. Guides have been created to support academics in policymaking consultation, but seldom give real-life examples.

Our project's brochure showcases twenty-one diverse examples of research-policy collaboration with detailed discussion, advice and more.

FINDINGS...

Academics in a wide variety of fields have collaborated with national, devolved and local governments, as well as parliamentary legislatures. Their research has informed policy decisions attracting multi-million pound investments and improving public life.

There are also commonalities in academics' experiences and advice. Interested?

Scan the QR code to find out more.

